You may be able to find more information about this and similar content, piano.io Have you ever wondered what it's like to see sound or odour color? It sounds absurd, but believe it or not, it's entirely possible for people with synaesthesia – a term used to describe the simultaneous experience of two connected senses. Most people will never experience synaesthesia unless they take large amounts of hallucinogenic drugs – but now, thanks to aerospace engineer Zachary Howard, you don't have to eat half a blotter of LSD to achieve the effect. Howard has designed a DIY synaesthesia mask that you can make on your own. With some cheap hardware and basic programming skills, you will be able to smell color like a synaesthete. Howard's mask actually starts with a at his fingertip. The sensor registers the color of what Howard touches and sends this data to an Intel Edison chip. The chip analyzes the detected color to divide it into the three components that computer computers color: red, green and blue. Then the chip processes the RGB color composition to the three fragrance containers that contain essential oils in the mask. Two small fans blow over the reservoirs to carry Howard the right amount of each fragrance on his nose. Instructables Instructables Instructables Instructables Since each fragrance was programmed to correspond to either red, blue, or green, the percentage of each hue used in the exact color Howard touched in the exact color was placed in the queue for a proportional release of each essential oil. In Howard's own version of the mask, grapefruit was red, tea tree was green and lavender blue. Touching grey objects would thus release an unpleasant mixture of each fragrance, but touching something blue would give Howard a comforting lavender kick. That's not to say you can't use the fragrance combination you like, thanks to step-by-step instructions to build your Synesthesia mask, which Howard shared through Instructables. Although many cases of synaesthesia are still a mystery to scientists, the prevailing understanding is that regions of the brain that control the different senses communicate with each other in synaesthetes in a way that they do not have on average in humans. If the part of the brain that controls vision is crossed with the part of the brain that controls the smell, for example, the result could very likely be synaesthesia. Howard's synaesthesia mask probably won't help scientists study the condition, but it could help ordinary people better understand the lives of their synaesthete family members and friends. Editors' Recommendations Source: Thinkstock Precious Metal Investors console themselves with the knowledge that their bullion has virtually zero counterparty risk. For example, a silver bullion will not go bankrupt amid an accounting scandal or default, as turbulence rattles financial markets. A silver bullion will also not disappoint the result, cut its dividend or hire an incompetent CEO. However, these benefits do not apply until you have received a physical delivery. Lawrence McWhinnie, my father, recently found out in the hard way. On June 1, 2015, he ordered 50 ounces of silver ingot from Northwest Territorial Mint (NWTM). The premiums were low, and he was looking for a new shiny bullion to play with. When he told me about the purchase, I was ailing. This particular coin has one of the worst reputations in the industry when it comes to receiving orders in a reasonable way. Judging by online reviews, it might be faster to get your hands on some silver by looking in your own backyard than by looking at it Territorial Mint. The company earns only one and a half out of five stars on Yelp, with 23 reviewers sharing their experiences. The majority of reviewers encountered lengthy delivery times and poor customer service. Complaints date back to July 2013. Tim P. from Oroville, California, writes: There is a first and one last time for everything, and sometimes they are the Time. I wish I had seen the negative reviews before sending them money that has been tied for months now. It almost makes me wonder if there is nuplet of gaming that they do to take money, keep it for months while you tell you that you can sell it back to them, and never really deliver a product for the majority of sales. Similar experiences can be found in the Better Business Bureau. Of the 161 complaints that have been closed to BBB in the last three years, 112 have been classified as delivery issues. 34 customers left written reviews, 29 of them negative. Horror stories on the BBB website include customers still waiting for their orders after paying 4-6 months earlier. After waiting more than four months, one person applied for a refund, which then took another two months. While some disappointed customers can be found in each company, a recent employee review on Glassdoor suggests that this type of practice is common. An anonymous employee writes that if you can sideline your ethics while the owner of this store lets his henchman communicate completely lies about why their orders are being delayed, this company is for you. Do you really believe that all order delays are due to material shortages, production backups, machine breakage, etc.? Don't you think Ross (CEO) isn't using your capital to trade in commodity markets to make money with OPM? Absolutely disgusting! On February 6, 2008, the Washington Prosecutor's Office filed a lawsuit against Northwest Territorial Mint for misrepresenting the delivery date, unfair refund policy, and failure to respond to consumer complaints. At the time of the filing, the Federal Prosecutor's Office, BBB and the Federal Trade Commission received a total of 82 consumer complaints listing the defendant's delivery delays. In 2008, a settlement was reached that required the Northwest Territorial Mint to pay a civil penalty of 20,000 U.S. dollars and nearly 38,000 U.S. dollars in legal fees. Ironically, Northwest Territorial Mint says its policy is to ship orders immediately after you have paid us properly. The company is quick to tout its relationship with the military and Boy Scouts of America, but it is also eager to inform customers that they can sell their undelivered, delayed orders back to Northwest Territorial Mint at current market value. If prices have fallen since the original order, this could result in customers losing money without even taking possession. My father was faced with this scenario. After waiting about two months for his order, Northwest sent Mint's infamous email claiming an unprecedented high order volume and said his order could take another 30 days to ship, but if he didn't want to wait, he could sell his silver back to the coin at current market prices. Of course, that meant taking a loss on his silver wareator without even playing with him, arguably the worst worst Silver to buy. He responded by informing the coin that he was entering a dispute with his credit card company. The next day, Northwest Territorial Mint shipped its silver. On September 11, 2015, my father finally received his order, almost three months after he had ordered it. The bars are beautiful, my father said. It is a pity that it has taken so long. I will never order from them again. Fortunately, there is no shortage of online bullion traders or places to check reviews. In addition to websites such as Yelp and BBB, golddealerreviews.com lists customer reports from major Bullion retailers such as Provident Metals, Texas Precious Metals, APMEX and some others. As with everything else in life: buyers beware. Follow Eric on Twitter @Mr_Eric_WSCS More of Money &mp; Career Cheat Sheet: Blatt:
